Detailed Description: The state DOT has released its options for the rebuilding of I-81 through downtown Syracuse. One of those options includes a tunnel. The state could go with a modern version of the viaduct that currently exists, but it would have to be wider to meet current federal regulations. Another consideration is what's being called the community grid alternative. It would re-route traffic from 81 around the city via 481 for through traffic. All other traffic would weave into the existing street grid. Back up for consideration? A tunnel. Because none of the four tunnel options from the draft report met the project's criteria, the DOT will conduct additional engineering to see if there is a way this could work.
