NEW RULES FOR CRAFT BREWERIES

Nearly eight months after a rush of pushback forced the state to pull back on a slate of restrictions aimed at regulating what craft breweries can and can't do, it's trying again. The Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control, a department under the state Attorney General's Office, issued a new special ruling Tuesday outlining a number of refined rules breweries need to follow. The regulations include limits on the number of events breweries can have, and what they can serve. Language in the new ruling says it works to consider the concerns of the 100 craft brewers in New Jersey, and the about 6,000 establishments across the state that hold full liquor licenses.

NY RENT LAW BILL

New York State Senate and Assembly leaders reached an agreement on a package of bills that would be the biggest rewrite of rent regulations in decades, extending protections for tenants, limiting landlords' ability to raise rents or remove units from regulation, and making the rules permanent. The legislation repeals the provisions that allow removal of units from rent stabilization when the rent crosses a high threshold and the unit becomes vacant or the tenant's income is $200,000 or higher in the preceding two years. It also eliminates the "vacancy bonus" provision that allows a property owner to raise rents as much as 20% each time a unit becomes vacant.
