The University of Pennsylvania just completed a first-of-its-kind study looking at the rate of false positives in field drug tests administered by police. Penn's study estimates that as many as 30 thousand Americans are arrested each year for false positive field drug tests. These are the kits that officers around the country use when – for example – a driver is pulled over for speeding or window tint violation and has a suspicious substance in their car. The officer uses these to perform a roadside test to see if it is, in fact, a drug. U. Penn's Quattrone Center for Fair Administration of Justice – which led the study – says because so many drug cases result in guilty pleas, these tests are among, if not the largest known cause of wrongful arrests and convictions in the U.S. Blayne speaks with a couple who spent two weeks in jail after a false field drug test.

	NBC Nightly News (6:30pm)	Health/Med	1:15	Melissa Lee - CNBC Investigates: Compounded Weight Loss Drugs: The explosive popularity of drugs being used for weight loss has led to shortages of the active agents semaglutide and tirzepatide. Those shortages trigger an FDA rule that allows for compounding similar medications, something dozens of pharmacies across the country are now doing — not FDA approved but allowed by the agency. Experts warn that the compounded medications come with many unknowns, including just where those molecules come from. But that doesn't stop people desperate for the help — and cheaper prices — from buying the medicines. CNBC's Melissa Lee previews her prime time special with a report on the explosion of not just weight loss drugs, but their compounded alternatives.

That's because private insurance often doesn't cover these drugs. Medicare is barred from paying for them and Medicaid access is limited. With out-of-pocket costs exceeding $1,000 per month, treatment for millions of low- and middle-income obese Americans is a non-starter. NBC News has obtained exclusive new data finding more than 4 million prescriptions for Wegovy and Ozempic were written in 2023. But the three states with the highest obesity rates in the U.S. — Louisiana, Oklahoma and West Virginia — don't even crack the top 10 list for states with the highest number of prescriptions. We travel to Oklahoma where we talk to patients fighting to get these drugs and the doctor who says she can't get her patients these potentially lifesaving meds.

	NBC Nightly News (6:30pm)	Health/Med	1:30	Medication Abortion on the Rise: New data show that medication abortions are on the rise in a post-Roe world. The abortion access group Guttmacher Institute reports that in 2020, medication abortion accounted for about half of all abortions. By 2023 they accounted for two-thirds, and abortions nationwide are on the rise even though more than a dozen states now prohibit them. (The data do not include women who seek abortions outside formal health care settings, meaning the numbers are likely higher). In a basement in New Paltz, N.Y., activists are stuffing envelopes with thousands of abortion pills a month, sending them out to folks in states where the procedure is banned. As of now, this is legal thanks to shield laws that protect providers who virtually prescribe and mail abortion pills to people in states with bans.
