Last summer, a team of researchers with the Southern Climate Impacts Planning Program conducted a survey across Tulsa to examine how a warming climate may impact residents of our city. The data was compiled over the past six months and a newly issued report shows how Tulsans feel about various hazards, how the city responds to them, and ways the city can make us more resilient to the impacts of disasters in the future.

Why Green Country gets so warm with a westerly wind

Date: 2/21/24 – 6pm

Duration: 2:15

Michael Grogan

We know that sunshine warms us up. It is also well known that a southerly wind often transports warmer temperatures into our area from hotter climate zones closer to the equator. There is another way we get warm temperatures in Oklahoma, and it's tied to our unique geography. This mechanism is what helped bring us a record high on Wednesday afternoon. It is called compressional warming.
