Multiple social, economic and health variables contribute to disparities by sex, race and ethnicity in the development, diagnosis and treatment of PAD. Opportunities to address disparities include greater focus on prevention in health care systems, increasing cultural competency and diversity among the physician workforce and public health efforts to raise awareness in affected communities. Implementing routine preventive strategies, such as regular blood glucose testing, ankle blood pressure monitoring and foot exams for high-risk individuals, may decrease the risk of PAD complications and improve outcomes, particularly among people from diverse racial and ethnic groups.

On an emotional front it is also critical to avoid, "hot button," conversations when gathered together. Health care organizations that can't keep up could be left behind. According to Deloitte's annual Health Care Outlook Survey, just 3% of health system executives, and 7% of health plan executives, have a "positive" outlook for 2024. Hospital systems are expected to see more merging of resources. It is also predicted that there will be more outsourcing as facilities are facing workforce talent challenges. In addition to managing the changing landscape of the healthcare industry, employers and employees are getting ready for additional challenges including the need to increase the number of children getting vaccinated, a desperate need for blood and tissue donors and tackling the fact that more and more infections are antibiotic resistant. We are also managing a rising mental health crisis as well as learning how to stay on top of the day to day illnesses like the flu and RSV.
