Idaho is facing a critical farm labor shortage that could threaten the agricultural industry's vitality. While this scarcity of labor is not unique to the Gem State, it is a widespread issue affecting farms nationwide. In a bid to resolve this crisis, Idaho Congressman Mike Simpson and a bipartisan group of lawmakers are determined to pass an immigration reform bill into law.

"There are so many undocumented workers working in agriculture today — if we can't get this passed, what's going to happen is you're going to deport these people, and then all of a sudden milk is gonna go to $50 a gallon or $100 a gallon," Simpson said. "You won't be able to have any cherries or strawberries or anything else that requires picking, all that kind of stuff. It would be devastating to our economy and to agriculture."

The Farm Workforce Modernization Act, reintroduced this year and passed by the House two years in a row, aims to create a legal workforce for agriculture, a priority underscored by Simpson. It seeks to bring undocumented workers "out of the shadows" by requiring them to comply with the law. This entails the payment of fines for their previous illegal entry into the country.
