Tonight we are going to replay one of our favorite shows for you, an interview with Murray Carpenter, author of Caffeinated: How Our Daily Habit Helps, Hurts, and Hooks Us. His book takes a comprehensive look at our favorite drug, its history, uses, mythbusting, and steaming hot facts.

If time permits: In addition to Murray Carpenter's book, Caffeinated, we want to give an Ecotopian recommendation for your informed leisure reading: The Coffee Trader, by David Liss. It's an historical novel set in 17th century Amsterdam, and involves the efforts of a commodity trader, first to introduce coffee drinking to the Dutch and then to corner the coffee bean market. There is much intrigue and skullduggery, and Liss has done extensive historical research into commodities trading that will remind you of more recent efforts to control markets such as oil. I found my copy at The Bookstore on Main Street.

Susan: And I'm Susan Tchudi

Too often, we fear, the themes and topics we undertake on Ecotopia are on the depressing side: The world will end unless we change . . . population, emissions, and so on.

Tonight we're doing the first of two programs that will bring us upbeat into the new year. Our guest in the first half of the show will be Sharon Kallis, author of a book titled Common Threads: Weaving Community through Collaborative Eco-Art. A resident of Vancouver, British Columbia, Sharon creates out of natural, often neglected material: everything from dog hair to invasive species.

Steve: And in the second half of the ^{program} we'll be talking with Kelly Munson, ~~Kelly Munson,~~ Advisor of Student Activities and Associated Students at Butte College, who is a remarkable artist and crafter in her own right and creates mandalas in the woods of Bidwell Park.

We'll also talk briefly about sustainable art and craft projects that are especially good for families during the school break period, and we'll tell you how to get a free project sheet that we've prepared.

6:10 or earlier, go live.

Steve: are listening to Ecotopia on KZFR, and tonight our topic is Eco-Art, discussing some ways we can bring beauty and a sense of community to the world around us. Our first guest is Sharon Kallis, who has written a book called Common Threads: Weaving Community from Vancouver BC.
