Description:

The European Parliament's recent ban on single-use plastic products was hailed as a positive step in the world's battle against climate change. Yet at the same time, younger generations around the world want to see more government action. Deeply concerned about their future as dire forecasts of a worsening environment continue, students from across the globe keep protesting. And while the threats often associated with climate change are to physical health, psychologists say the toll it takes on mental health can't be ignored. "The impact that all the aspects of climate change have on mental health is far-reaching," says Leslie Landis (www.chendell.com), a family therapist and author of Chendell: A Natural Warrior, a fantasy novel about young people trying to save Earth from environmental catastrophe.

Description:

Local Seattle author Susan Welch spent the first days of her life in 1962 in the St. Paul Catholic Infants Home, nicknamed "Watermelon Hill," for the unfortunate children of unwed mothers. Forty-six years later, after the death of her parents, she was told about her family's long-held secret— that she had been adopted by the only family she had known her entire life. To stop her mind from reeling with new revelations of her origins, she wrote A THREAD SO FINE, a novel layered with realities, truths, and insights about motherhood, womanhood, and the stigma from unwed mothers, "illegitimate children," and childless women.

Description:

There are any number of problems that coincide with homelessness and while we read so much about the troubles, not many of us are taking action. That's where Frank and Louise Fargo come into play. They've identified the need for people to get clean. We'll learn today about how you can get a free shower in the Everett area and the path that led to operation.
