* This is our regular segment where we present a current issue and solicit viewer input of their opinions on that issue. Today's issue was early primaries: "Do you think an earlier primary really gives a state more clout in the Presidential election?" It's the first vote of the Presidential election year.... but how important is the Iowa caucus? Conventional political wisdom dictates that if you don't do well in Iowa... and then New Hampshire.... your campaign is essentially over. The early emphasis given to those states is the primary reason why Florida, Michigan, Nevada, and South Carolina moved, or tried to move, their primaries to earlier dates. Of course, money is also a big reason. States like it when campaigns spend millions on campaign workers, hotel stays, restaurants, and advertising trying to win those early rounds. Florida's primary is now just a few weeks away. But is Iowa as important as we've come to believe? And will Florida's earlier primary give it any more of a say than in years past?

 Today's issue was Robo-calls: "Should Floridians be able to block automated campaign calls?" The latest polls show Mitt Romney with a double digit lead over Newt Gingrich heading into tomorrow's primary in Florida. You can tell the vote is near, because those automated campaign calls are ringing phones non-stop. Some come from the campaigns themselves. Others are from those super-PACs that claim not to endorse a specific candidate... but obviously endorse a specific candidate. And there's practically nothing you can do about them. In Florida, the Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services administers the state's "do not call" list. You can put a stop to unwanted sales calls by signing up... but Florida law says political calls are exempt. That's because the law was crafted by politicians.

*16 Today's issue was Political Endorsements: "Do political endorsements affect your decisions in the voting booth?" Republican Presidential candidate Mitt Romney picked up two more big endorsements this week. Florida Senator Marco Rubio threw his support behind Romney today. Former President George H.W. Bush is expected to do the same tomorrow. And last week, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush announced his endorsement of the GOP frontrunner. Endorsements have been a big thing in politics for a long time.... and not just from other politicians. The New York Times is often credited with offering the first newspaper endorsement of a presidential candidate back in 1860... supporting some guy named Abe Lincoln. Warren G. Harding is usually credited with being the first candidate to make widespread use of celebrity endorsements.... courting the approval of such movie stars as Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, and Al Jolson back in 1920. But what's the point of these endorsements? Are we really more likely to vote for someone because someone else likes them? Are they truly a good indication of a candidate's qualifications... or just another marketing tactic? They've got to help shape a campaign to some degree. Why else would they seem so important to a candidate.... and why else would we continue to report on them, right?

10th), and the U.S. Senate race.
