This week on Need to Know, we look at the State Department's recent suspension of international adoption of abandoned children in Nepal. We traveled to Nepal to meet with Americans who had adopted children there but were unable to bring them home.

Also, in the wake of Osama bin Laden's death this week, we explore the financial cost of the war on terror and America's efforts to prioritize security after the events of September 11, 2001. Princeton University professor Bernard Haykel also joins us to discuss the Arab world's reaction to bin Laden's death, arguing that it is not the end of jihadism, and Jon Meacham comments on opportunities his death could provide for the U.S.'s national agenda. Read more of Need to Know's coverage of Osama bin Laden's death.

And: Alison Stewart moderates a panel of three women on the economic, political and legal status of women today, including the fight over reproductive rights. And New Yorker cartoonist Roz Chast provides an animation for a unique take on the story of the Ant and the Grasshopper.

THE LORD IS NOT ON TRIAL HERE TODAY tells the compelling personal story behind one of the most important and landmark First Amendment cases in U.S. Supreme Court history, the case that set the foundation for the separation of church and state in public schools. The film recounts what Vasti McCollum later described as "three years of headlines, headaches, and hatred," but which eventually led to a decision that still resonates in the church-state conflicts of today, 60 years after the original decision in McCollum vs. Board of Education.

This week on Need to Know, we investigate a task force in the U.S.
military charged with investigating abuse of detainees in Iraq after the harrowing revelations of Abu Ghraib came to light. One special agent alleges that the task force is under-resourced and overwhelmed, which prevents it from being able to function adequately.

We also look at the structure of the telecommunications industry and competition in Europe, and how it has propelled the region ahead of the U.S. in terms of broadband service. We also report on how the humanitarian community has used mobile technology to aid people in times of crisis, and how it has been used to help victims of the earthquakes in Haiti and Japan, the tornadoes in the Midwest and the unrest in the Middle East.

And: Alison Stewart speaks with "Freedom Riders" Francis and Laura Randall, who took part in protests against Jim Crow laws in the deep south 50 years ago, and Jon Meacham's "In Perspective" essay honors the long career of Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who retires this year.

Speed. Meth. Glass. On the street, methamphetamine has many names. What started as a fad among motorcycle gangs in the 1970s has become big business, largely due to the efforts of two Mexican drug runners who began smuggling ephedrine -- the same chemical used to make over-the-counter cold remedies -- into California by the ton. Hundreds of illegal meth labs are now operating in the western United States, and the effects are sweeping the nation. From coast to coast, meth abuse is on the rise, but who's responsible? Is the government doing enough to crack down on this latest drug craze? In a reporting partnership with The Oregonian, FRONTLINE investigates America's addiction to meth and exposes the inherent conflict between the illegal drug trade and the legitimate three-billion-dollar cold remedy business.

This week, we explore the threats that climate change may already be posing to human health. We report on a rare but deadly fungal disease, previously known to occur only in tropical and subtropical regions, that has recently led to several deaths in the Pacific Northwest. Scientists believe climate change may have already affected the spread of other diseases like West Nile virus and dengue fever.

Also: We revisit the Upper Big Branch coal mining disaster, one year later, to find out the results of the investigation into the cause of the explosion. We also take a look at the sophisticated and alarming Stuxnet worm, the first major manifestation of a physical cyber attack that targeted an Iranian uranium enrichment facility last year.

And: We speak with John Esposito of Georgetown University on President Obama's attempt to redefine the U.S.'s relationship with the Middle East in light of the Arab Spring, and Jon Meacham returns with another "In Perspective" essay.

In recent weeks, many U.S. cities have experienced massive devastation from one of the deadliest tornado seasons in decades. This week on Need to Know, we explore whether climate change has played a significant role. We also feature the story of one Iraq War veteran, Scott Winkler, whose war injury led him to take up paralympic sports, become a world-class athlete and help his fellow soldiers.

Also: Earlier this year, we featured a look at Detroit's plan to "right-size" the city, using financial incentives to entice residents to move. Continuing with our "Shrinking Cities" series, this week we visit Youngstown, Ohio, a city trying to cope with population loss and abandoned buildings by revitalizing itself on a smaller scale.

And: Alison Stewart interviews New York Times East Africa Bureau Chief Jeffrey Gettleman on Libyans' attitudes toward Col. Moammar Gadhafi and the political outlook for Africa's newest country, South Sudan.

This week, we explore the threats that climate change may already be posing to human health. We report on a rare but deadly fungal disease, previously known to occur only in tropical and subtropical regions, that has recently led to several deaths in the Pacific Northwest. Scientists believe climate change may have already affected the spread of other diseases like West Nile virus and dengue fever.

Also: We revisit the Upper Big Branch coal mining disaster, one year later, to find out the results of the investigation into the cause of the explosion. We also take a look at the sophisticated and alarming Stuxnet worm, the first major manifestation of a physical cyber attack that targeted an Iranian uranium enrichment facility last year.

And: We speak with John Esposito of Georgetown University on President Obama's attempt to redefine the U.S.'s relationship with the Middle East in light of the Arab Spring, and Jon Meacham returns with another "In Perspective" essay.

In recent weeks, many U.S. cities have experienced massive devastation from one of the deadliest tornado seasons in decades. This week on Need to Know, we explore whether climate change has played a significant role. We also feature the story of one Iraq War veteran, Scott Winkler, whose war injury led him to take up paralympic sports, become a world-class athlete and help his fellow soldiers.

Also: Earlier this year, we featured a look at Detroit's plan to "right-size" the city, using financial incentives to entice residents to move. Continuing with our "Shrinking Cities" series, this week we visit Youngstown, Ohio, a city trying to cope with population loss and abandoned buildings by revitalizing itself on a smaller scale.

And: Alison Stewart interviews New York Times East Africa Bureau Chief Jeffrey Gettleman on Libyans' attitudes toward Col. Moammar Gadhafi and the political outlook for Africa's newest country, South Sudan.

This week on Need to Know, we feature an investigation into the globalization of the pharmaceutical industry. Has insufficient oversight of foreign clinical trials led to dangerous drugs becoming available or staying on the U.S. market? We also delve into the problem of nuclear waste storage in the U.S. As policymakers turn to nuclear energy as a necessary part of our energy policy, the question of where nuclear waste will go remains unanswered. Theoretical physicist Brian Greene also joins us to discuss what science tells us about the possibility of multiple universes and different planes of reality. And: We visit several up-and-coming gourmet food trucks that have been proliferating on streets throughout the country as a model of thriving entrepreneurship borne from the recession, and editorial cartoonist Steve Brodner conducts an illustrated interview with author Eduardo Porter on the rise of income inequality in the U.S.
