Thanks Greg.

Here are those talking points from the 3rd party economist:

We don't need to use all of this but whatever you think would be the most impactful.

If we can get this adjusted we'd like to move forward asap.

- The solar and battery storage facility, along with the related construction activity, would have a lifetime impact on the Yuma economy of $400M, or the same as ½ of a Super Bowl.
- More than 850 jobs will be supported during construction, and approximately 40 jobs will be permanent.
- All of this economic activity also generates more than $140M in new government tax revenues that can be used to provide better services to residents, lower taxes, or a combination of the two.
- Resident's paychecks across the state will increase by a total of nearly $80M with well over half of that value benefiting local residents, thus helping the typical Yuma area household as well as providing stability to area businesses as the extra money is spent in the Yuma economy.
- While these numbers are impressive, they can be considered conservative. This is because the region supporting environmental tech business activity such as this solar facility, will likely open the door for more participation in environmental technology that is developing in the state but has not yet reached Yuma.
- The longer-term goal for economic development professionals in Yuma and across Arizona is for select economic "hubs" to be created that take advantage of the opportunities in environmental technology and expand on specific areas of economic growth such as advanced research and development in water conservation, advancements in agriculture sciences, efficiency development in farming, among others.
- For context on then statewide opportunity, Arizona is currently underweighted in what are considered "green" jobs. If the state developed these industries to its potential, the extra economic activity would result in another $500M in statewide tax collections that can be reinvested or returned to the taxpayer.

- If the Yuma region were to utilize the momentum derived from embracing environmental technology opportunities such as the proposed solar project, and then leveraged the momentum to further develop environmental related sciences in the region, the overall impact from this newly found economic momentum would equal more than $5M in additional local government tax revenues EVERY YEAR.
- If this value is considered over the lifespan of the project, cumulative tax revenue gains would reach $175M. This is even larger than the tax revenues derived from the solar facility itself.
- The additional revenue can also be used to enhance the local tourism industry, which is currently underweighted compared to the state. Efforts to promote outdoor activities including hunting can add even more revenue to the impact numbers.
- It is clear that Yuma leaders need to start embracing the economic opportunities that are presented, beginning with the solar project. If support is not achieved, the project will be embraced by another host.
- This effort will only be the beginning of an economic renaissance in the region that will lift resident incomes, lower taxes, and allow the community to reach its full potential.

I've got semi-approval.
Definitely want to move forward.
The project lead asked if we could add some important elements (economic impact) and perhaps a few different spots that would focus on different aspects of the project like Tax Revenue or Gross Economic Impact or Jobs Created.
Does that seem possible?
