Indiana Congresswoman Jackie Walorski, who represents portions of northern Indiana in Congress, is hoping her bill will help cut off the trafficking of fentanyl at its source using the court system. "It's very interesting that this bill is a way to bring justice to families and victims since Joe Biden is doing nothing about the border," Walorski told Newsmax. "My bill basically says that if you are the family of a victim, you can file a lawsuit in federal court and go after these countries are this poisonous fentanyl is coming from."

In this case, according to Walorski, it's China and Mexico in particular. Both of these countries have said that they can't be held liable for drug cartels operating there and trafficking fentanyl into the United States. Walorski's bill would say otherwise is signed into law.

"We're seeing stories every day right here of people who are being arrested bringing so much fentanyl across our border that it can kill millions and millions of people with a tiny, tiny dose," Walorski added.

In 2021, over 71,000 U.S. citizens died from fentanyl overdoses, which accounts for about two-thirds of overdose deaths in the United States last year.

At least, that's according to the owner of Mt. Comfort RV in Hancock County. Ken Eckstein said that over the last year he has sold more RVs to people ages 18 to 34 and any other demographic.

"When you look at the millennials, they are much more outdoor people. They like hiking, they like boating, they like bicycling, and I think that plays right into what we offer here," Eckstein said to WISH-TV.

At first, he said the surge was fueled by the COVID pandemic, people who usually would not consider buying an RV or camper were in search of something to do. One of the few things he says you could do was camp. That same group of people is still buying up RV's nearly two years after the lockdowns were lifted.

Eckstein added that surging gas prices, inflation, and rising interest rates haven't hampered sales either. He said in today's age of always being on your phone, he feels millennials are taking RVs as a breath of fresh air.

"What we're doing is selling a product that by design gets you away from that screen, gets you out with your family, with your loved ones, out with people, and you're interacting in a very personal way," Eckstein said.

Most of the world's RVs are made in Elkhart.
