Topic: 2020 Democratic presidential candidate, Andrew Yang, wants to form a third party

United States is continuing to divide, and opinion polls show that supporters of Republicans and Democrats prefer to live in two countries, one made up of red states and the other of blue states. Obviously, ideological "dilemma" has spread to life of each level. Andrew Yang, a Chinese-American who was a blockbuster in the last Democratic presidential primary election and later lost in the New York mayoral primary election, made a comeback and with aspiration to form a third political party - "Forward Party", vowing to change the existing two-party system, because the old system has shown to be exhausted in the 21st century. In Andrew Yang's view, in the context of the red-blue battle, the interests of most voters who want to take the middle path are ignored or hijacked. This political model is unsustainable. If it does not change, the defeat of the United States will continue to deepen.
