This week on Valley Edition Reporter Ali Budner takes a look into at Fresno Food Commons and reports on what kind of impact it's having on the region. We also hear about Clovis Unified dress code issues with Fresno Bee Reporter Mackenzie Mays and Bakersfield Californian Columnist Lois Henry. Henry also discusses Kern County topics including wastewater and oil. We also hear about how the pistachio industry is worried about Iranian nuts that could enter the market later this year.

Ending the program we hear from Whitney Holladay about the Freedmen's Bureau Project. It's a campaign to digitize and archive millions of records generated 150 years ago by the government agency tasked with helping former slaves begin their lives as free citizens. The group is seeking the help of volunteers to help clear through a backlog of documents so they can reach a goal to complete the project by June 19th, historically known as Juneteenth Day. It's also the subject of a symposium taking place today at Fresno State.

2/23/16 VE 9:00-10:00am

Issues: Local, Poverty, Government & Politics, Environmental, Agriculture, Arts & Entertainment

This week on Valley Edition we hear from KVPR Reporter Jeffrey Hess about how the Fresno Bridge Academy is helping Valley families out of poverty. We also hear from Dean Florez who was recently appointed to the California Air Resources Board. Reporter Jeffrey Hess also explains the poppy super bloom taking place across California. Also in the show, 31st Assembly District seat candidate Ted Miller joins the program to talk about the race.

Later, FM89 reporter Ezra David Romero reports on the reasoning behind why Californians pronounce the word almond so differently from each other. And ending the program we celebrate the 60th anniversary of the Fresno Community Chorus Master Chorale with Director Anna Hamre.

3/1/16 VE 9:00-10:00am

Issues: Local, Politics, Healthcare, Children, Environmental, Agriculture, Arts & Entertainment

On today's show, three men want to be Fresno's next mayor. We kickoff our look at the race to lead California's fifth largest city, with the one political outsider in the race - pastor and community leader activist H. Spees. Does his vision for Fresno's future match yours?

We also learn from California Healthline Reporter David Gorn about a change starting this month to a state program that provides care to autistic children that has some parents upset and what it means for the Valley. FM89's Ezra David Romero reports on an almond variety that could harm the bee industry. Plus the Rogue Festival begins its wacky run. Rogue producer Jonathon Hogan joins the conversation.

Voters Could Have Say on Death Penalty as Death Row Backs Up

California last executed a death row inmate exactly 10 years ago this Sunday. On the state's death row right now sit 745 people. Californians are split right down the middle over whether to speed up these executions or stop them completely. That's according to a new survey out Friday from the Field Poll. Come November, voters might have a say on how to fix the system as there are two very different ballot measures in the works.

Inside San Quentin's Death Row, Inmates Disagree on Capital Punishment

A new Field Poll on the death penalty shows Californians are almost evenly split between putting an end to executions and speeding them up. We get a rare glimpse inside of a place most of us will never visit -- and wouldn't want to: death row at San Quentin Prison. It houses some of the state's most notorious criminals. But the reality is executions are few and far between. It was 10 years ago this weekend that the last condemned inmate was put to death. Journalists rarely see death row, or talk to the prisoners there. KQED's Politics and Government Editor Scott Shafer got to do just that, and he found a wide range of opinions about capital punishment. Reporter: Scott Shafer

Turf Dancing and Ballet Meet Halfway

Turf dancers developed their athletic and acrobatic style in Oakland -- performing on streets and public transportation. Catching Storm Runoff Could Ease Droughts, But It's No Quick Fix

After a freakishly dry February, El Nino has come roaring back with all the makings of a March Miracle. Water levels have improved and Thursday, the Dept. of Water Resources said their customers will be getting more water than they expected but still less than half of what they asked for. But officials also made it clear: California remains in a drought. Fortunately, there are engineers and scientists who've kept their eye on the water conservation ball during this wet season. They see that while Sierra snow is piling up again and reservoirs are rising, in thirsty cities, much of the rain that falls is gulped down by storm drains and ends up in the ocean. This runaway rain is starting to get serious attention as a potential source of water. Reporter: Molly Peterson

How a Determined L.A. Reporter Helped Expose the Alleged Grim Sleeper Killer

In the mid-1980s, the crack cocaine epidemic raged in South Los Angeles. Deadly gang warfare bloodied the streets. But these murders were different: young black women, killed in the same manner and dumped on the streets. By 1988, the murders appeared to stop. Around 15 years later, they resumed, inspiring L.A. Weekly reporter Christine Pelisek to nickname the killer the Grim Sleeper. Pelisek also broke the story behind the investigation that eventually led police to a retired sanitation worker named Lonnie Franklin Jr. He's now accused of murdering at least nine women and a teenage girl in South L.A. between 1985 and 2007.
