Home Radon Testing

Nearly 1 out of every 15 homes in the U.S. is estimated to have elevated radon levels. Elevated levels of radon gas have been found in homes in your state. Contact your state radon office for general information about radon in your area. While radon problems may be more common in some areas, any home may have a problem. The only way to know about your home is to test. Radon can also be a problem in schools and workplaces. Ask your state radon office about radon problems in schools, daycare and childcare facilities, and workplaces in your area.

Adoption Awareness Training Program

At the Infant Adoption Awareness Training Program, we have accepted a challenge. Our goal is to actively seek opportunities to communicate the possibilities associated with infant adoption to the general public across the U.S. With this challenge in mind, we are proud to provide this nation-wide public information campaign designed to raise localized awareness and say "Thank you" to all those who consider adoption. We have created an exciting program to share complete and accurate information coast-to-coast and strengthen the abilities of counselors to serve the needs of their clients. The program, although national in scope, is currently being offered right in your hometown.
