In a somewhat dizzying few weeks at the Supreme Court, religious freedom has taken center stage. In two significant decisions yesterday, the Court protected our First Amendment's First Freedom. The first case, Little Sisters of the Poor v. Pennsylvania, was the third time a group of nuns visited the nation's highest court, and the latest installment in their nearly 10-year-battle against the HHS Contraceptive Mandate. In 2017, a regulation issued by the Trump administration exempted the Little Sisters and any employers "with sincerely held moral convictions opposed to . . . some or all contraceptive or sterilization methods," from the Obamacare mandate which required them to provide and pay for the coverage. The state of Pennsylvania challenged that exemption, and the Third Circuit court ruled in the state's favor. Yesterday, with a 7-2 vote, the Supreme Court reversed the appeals court. The more decisive decision issued by the Court yesterday came in the case known as Our Lady of Guadalupe School v. Morrissey-Berru. Two Catholic schools in California who chose not to renew the contracts of two fifth-grade teachers "due to poor performance," including "failure to follow basic educational expectations" were sued by those teachers for discrimination. In another 7-2 vote, the Court sided with the schools because, as the opinion put it, "federal employment discrimination laws do not apply to teachers whose duties include instruction in religion at schools run by churches." The two decisions issued yesterday make this very significant term of the Supreme Court even more so: Handcuffing the ability of states to restrict abortion, re-writing civil rights laws, further protecting the religious freedom of religious institutions to live by their convictions while limiting the rights of for-profit employers to do the same.

You'd think that a global pandemic that's killed hundreds of thousands would at least temper the advance of legal killing. It hasn't. While headlines worldwide were praising New Zealand's prime minister for her handling of COVID-19, she was working to pass what might be described as the most extreme abortion laws on the planet. In late March, New Zealand's parliament voted, in the words of the New York Times, to "loosen" the nation's abortion laws, particularly in the latter half of pregnancy when babies become viable outside of the womb. "Loosen" may be the understatement of the decade. New Zealand's "loosened" laws now allow abortion on-demand, up to the moment of birth, for essentially any reason. That means sex-selective and disability-selective abortions, including for conditions like cleft lip and Down syndrome. Even more horrific still, New Zealand's new law includes no requirement that babies born alive after botched abortions be given medical support.

Writing recently in the New York Times, Stanford Law School professor Michael McConnell takes an optimistic view, not only of the 2020 U.S. Supreme Court term, but of the court’s track record on religious freedom. “In 13 cases involving religion since 2012,” he writes, “the religious side prevailed in 12 of them, sometimes by lopsided majorities.” This string of victories are part of what McConnell calls a “jurisprudence of pluralism,” which, as he puts it, “seems to side with the party defending the right to live in accordance with one’s identity.” This includes “the right of a religious order to refuse to provide employees with coverage for contraceptive drugs that violate its teachings, or the right of religious schools to be free of government interference with their choice of people to teach religious doctrine or practice to their children.” While it is certainly good news that Court recognizes the rights of religious institutions to be, well, religious, the “jurisprudence of pluralism” also includes, as we found out in this term’s Bostock decision, a newly discovered “right” for men to dress as women at their places of employment. In other words, if this term of the Supreme Court reveals anything, it’s that it is committed to balancing religious freedom protections with honoring the “right to define one’s own concept of existence,” a concept infamously invented by Justice Anthony Kennedy in 1992. In my opinion, the Court is not succeeding at threading this needle. Once again, the Court did protect the religious freedom rights of definitively religious institutions, something it’s been repeatedly clear about for years. However, the Court did not protect the religious freedom of religious individuals. Instead, the Court curtailed the conscience rights of employers by decreeing that sexual orientation and gender identity are essentially protected categories in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

Last week, Planned Parenthood of Greater New York announced that the name of the organization’s founder, Margaret Sanger, would be removed from its clinic. They also asked the city to rename a local street known as “Margaret Sanger Square.” Sanger is being cancelled because of her advocacy of eugenics, a movement that began in the early 1900s and promoted the idea that the human race could be “improved” by selective breeding. Proponents of eugenics, like Sanger, wanted wealthy, healthy and strong people to have more babies, and poor, sick, disabled and minority people to have fewer (or no) babies. In 1939, in fact, Sanger and Planned Parenthood launched something called the Negro Project, whose aim was to push birth control on black women. An estimated 62 million babies have been killed by abortion since Roe v. Wade. While African Americans make up about 13 percent of the U.S. population, black babies account for nearly 40 percent of the abortions committed each year. Black moms are somewhere between three and five times more likely to have an abortion than white moms. In New York City, there are thousands more black babies aborted than are actually born each year. Apparently, Margaret Sanger’s legacy remains integral to Planned Parenthood’s marketing strategy; that is, to kill the babies of poor, minority moms.

Earlier this month, North Carolina Governor Roy Cooper made an announcement. Actually, he made more of a non-announcement: He wasn't sure whether North Carolina schools would reopen this Fall. A few hours later, the state government's website handling parents' applications to homeschool crashed. According to the error message, the crash was "due to an overwhelming number of submissions." Like so many problems brought to the forefront by the COVID-19 pandemic, the schooling crisis doesn't have an easy solution. Since the Spring, school officials have sounded the alarm on distance and digital learning, saying it's "not enough." Meanwhile, many parents are also saying that online school, at least the kind hastily created of necessity this spring, is not working. Many are stuck juggling their own work-from-home jobs with their kids' school needs, trying to share tech devices and limited bandwidth among multiple family members. While some health and government officials warn that a return to five-day-a-week in-person school in the fall will be too risky, the Secretary of Education is pushing for reopening schools nationwide. It's a high-stakes Catch-22. This is the time for good-old-fashioned Christian innovation in education. Because private Christian schools prioritizes smaller class sizes, they have the space inside their schools to allow kids to come back full-time in the fall while following strict social distancing guidelines. This is a moment for Christian education to shine brighter. Parents who didn't consider private school in the past might now consider it.

The summer of 2020 has been one of discontent in some American cities. Civil unrest has led to damaging protests... with some rioting continuing for weeks. Wisconsin State Senator Tim Carpenter was attacked while he took a picture of a group of rioters – who tore down two statues on Capitol grounds. Senator Carpenter was hit from behind and lost consciousness. 2 of the attackers are in custody. This summer's events have required local elected officials to respond with kindness and firmness. Peaceful protesters deserve to be heard and treated with respect. Rioters and looters are a different story... they should be arrested and prosecuted. Many Mayors seem unwilling or unable to distinguish between the peaceful protesters and the rioters.

Last school year, educators were forced to pivot on the fly from in-person instruction to online planning and teaching, while still trying to get students to the end of the term and seniors to graduation. As this school year begins, they face the daunting task of communicating ever-changing plans and guidelines to students and families. To call it challenging is an understatement. Christian educators, whether homeschool parents or teachers and administrators at private, classical, or charter schools, must navigate these challenges while still fulfilling their unique mission. Christian education begins with Christian assumptions about life and the world, aims for Christian goals, and is governed by Christian methodologies. In both their personal beliefs and their public lives, we hope to help students love God with heart, mind, soul, and strength, and love their neighbors as themselves. It's an enormous task. Like all of us, Christian educators need ongoing training and tailored professional development to serve the unique challenges of their vocation. Christian education is vital to the future of the Church, and the health of our students and our nation.

To paraphrase King Solomon, to the writing of statements there is no end. However last week, I was honored to be included among the original signatories of The Philadelphia Statement, an essential appeal at this important moment in our cultural history. Acknowledging the current crisis overwhelming speech rights, the Philadelphia Statement calls for such rights to be protected, as an essential condition for the survival and flourishing of self-governing people. “Freedom of expression is in crisis,” the Statement begins. “Truly open discourse—the debates, exchange of ideas, and arguments on which the health and flourishing of a democratic republic crucially depend—is increasingly rare.” This paragraph is an answer to the well-meaning Christians who, at times, ask whether it is appropriate to be involved in “political debates” over things like free speech or religious freedom. Part of the Christian’s calling is to steward and protect good things. Freedom of expression is one of those good things, and not just for us. Here’s how the Statement puts it: “If we seek a brighter future, we must relearn a fundamental truth. That our liberty and happiness depend upon the maintenance of a public culture in which freedom and civility co-exist. Where people can disagree robustly, even fiercely, yet treat each other as human beings, and indeed fellow citizens, not mortal enemies.”

Recently, political scientist Michael J. New described the results of what's being called "the largest known in-depth interview study of American attitudes on abortion" as "nuanced." A better term would be "complicated," or maybe even "not-at-all coherent." This new study out of Notre Dame, entitled "How Americans Understand Abortion," not only sought to determine what Americans believe about abortion, but why they believe it and which factors influenced those beliefs. Anyone who opposes abortion and is committed to protecting the preborn can learn much from the results. For example, I found it fascinating that, according to the study, most Americans are simply not "particularly knowledgeable about the details of abortion." Another lesson to learn from this Notre Dame study is that we must do a better job publicizing the "life-affirming work done by the thousands of pregnancy help centers in the United States." The most important lesson from this study, however, is just how deeply moral relativism is shaping the abortion debate. Though a large percentage of Americans dislike abortion, they are uncomfortable with making abortion illegal. The data is incredible. Even those who think that abortion should be legal know that something is wrong with it. And yet, they simply can't imagine an alternative to the status quo. The case that abortion is wrong must be made alongside the case that abortion should be illegal, and not just by the "pro-life professionals." If the Supreme Court manages to overturn Roe v Wade, and we should pray it does, the status and safety of preborn children will be decided on a state-by-state basis.

In July, the U.S. State Department's "Commission on Unalienable Rights" released a draft report that attempted to provide a grounding for our country's commitment to human rights. Fundamental among those rights, the report declared, are freedom of religion and the right to private property. Most Americans take the existence of human rights for granted. We see them, to borrow a phrase, as "self-evident." We can't really imagine a world without them, or we look at places like China or North Korea with incredulity, as if it's obvious that their way is clearly wrong. Instead, what these countries demonstrate is that there's nothing "natural" about the idea of human rights. Rather they are the products of Judeo-Christian beliefs about the intrinsic dignity of the human person. After all, as the State Department report points out, "more than half the world's population suffers under regimes where the most basic freedoms are systematically denied, or under regimes too weak or unwilling to protect individual rights, especially in the context of ethnic conflict." The only secure basis for human rights, of course, is the Christian belief that humans are created in the image of God.

Most public schools across the country are either attempting to hold school remotely or, in some hybrid form, brings kids back in the classroom in a limited way, keeping the numbers low. And that's just for now. The plan has already changed in many districts and will likely change again before all is said and done. The only sure thing, when it comes to this school year is that it is not going to be a normal one. For a group of churches and ministries in Ohio, this is an opportunity to, in the words of the prophet Jeremiah, seek the welfare of the city. A few months ago, public school districts in Columbus asked local churches to provide additional space for students who have working parents, and whose school would not be opening for in-person instruction. Looking for places where students could access tech devices and the internet, be under adult supervision, where food could be provided, churches in Columbus opened their doors. Two months ago, Ohio lawmakers passed a bill clarifying the rights of students to express their religious faith at school. Sponsors of the bill said schools were treating Christian clubs differently than other clubs, not allowing them to meet in school buildings, and students were being told they couldn't express their Christian beliefs in school assignments or projects. The fact that this bill, which the governor quickly signed into law, was even necessary is cause for concern. And frankly, there's frustration that, after such hostility, the schools would now turn to churches for help. The churches, however, set all that aside to seize an opportunity to offer Christian generosity as a powerful witness to the city of Columbus.

Medical science, embryology, and technologies like ultrasound have settled, beyond a doubt, that abortion takes a human life. Neither a male sperm cell nor a female egg cell are human beings, but once they unite, there is a different kind of entity: a distinct human life. Why is abortion wrong when embryos naturally die by miscarriage every day? The answer is found by applying the same rules to these preborn humans as we would to humans outside the womb. Millions of people die every day, so why should we be so against murder? The difference between millions of people dying every day by natural causes and those who die by murder is intent. It is wrong to take an innocent human life... any innocent human life. Fertilized eggs, embryos, fetuses, newborns, teenagers, and adults are all human beings.

Last Wednesday, while leading our weekly prayer webinar for the Church and our nation, Bishop Garland Hunt tackled a question most of us have, "Is it even possible to find racial healing in a nation so deeply divided?" Only the Church, he said, has the path to healing. Or, another way to put what should be obvious by now, no other institution offers a real way forward for the sins of our past and the conflict of our present.

For years, advocates within the abortion industry have obscured and misled, dodging the consequences of their actions by both euphemisms and deception. Now, thanks to a new round of videos released by pro-life activist David Dalieden and the Center for Medical Progress, at least a handful of abortionists have been forced into brutal honesty. In 2015, Dalieden first released a series of videos, taken undercover, of multiple Planned Parenthood executives bragging about how lucrative the practice of selling body parts from aborted babies was. One executive, Mary Gatter, famously said, on camera, that she hoped to sell enough body parts to buy a Lamborghini. During deposition, when asked to clarify this comment, Nguyen admitted that sometimes aborted babies were, in fact, delivered with limbs still attached to the torso. Sometimes, she said, the fetuses may even be delivered with the “calvarium” attached. “Calvarium” is Latin for part of a skull. What she is describing is partial-birth abortion. Even that, however, is a euphemism for what is, really, a live dissection. Tram Nguyen can use all the Latin she wants, but she still admitted under oath that Planned Parenthood partially delivered babies and then killed them to sell their body parts.

Human Trafficking	9/10/20	7:56pm	5 minutes	Breakpoint

In just the past two months, authorities in Michigan, Ohio, and Georgia rescued 58 children, ranging in age from three to seventeen, who were either missing or were victims of sex trafficking. In Ohio and Georgia, United States Marshals led the rescue missions. In 2005, a partnership with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children launched operations like these all across the country. In addition to the children who were rescued, more than two dozen predators were arrested. Terms such as “sex trafficking” or “human trafficking” evoke a certain made-for-Hollywood image, of high-tech cartels in big cities run by wealthy criminal masterminds. While those operations exist, the truth is often less flashy and more common. According to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, child sex trafficking includes the “recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, obtaining or advertising of a minor child for the purpose of a commercial sex act.” Of the roughly 24-thousand endangered runaways reported last year, estimates are that one in six were victims of sex trafficking. Traffickers aren’t always the shadowy strangers nabbing girls in an airport or shopping mall. Often, they are family members or family friends, such as parents who’ve lost custody or guardians looking to profit. Runaways are particularly vulnerable to people who are willing to take them in with intent to use them. In other words, trafficking in some form or another could be happening in most of our communities. The success of these rescue missions in Ohio, Georgia, and Michigan are worth celebrating. If we ever hope to end sex trafficking, however, we’ll need to be more honest and more holistic in our approach to the problem.

Over the next 12 weeks or so, with election season in full gear, we've planned a set of videos to tackle the various political and policy questions and issues that are front and center on people's minds. These videos will not only equip Christians for conversations about the presidential campaign and the place of faith in the public square, but also about those issues central to state and local ballots, including abortion restrictions, education, economics, race, and civic responsibility. Over the next few weeks, we will release videos that tackle two political questions having to do with abortion. In early October, a series of What Would You Say videos will tackle questions about voting: "Why Should Christians Vote?" "Should I Vote if I Don't Like Any of the Candidates?" and, of course, how to respond to that old line "My Vote Won't Make a Difference Anyway."

I'm old enough to remember that time, way back in 2018, when Democrats and Republicans worked together. Really, it did happen and resulted in a major, bi-partisan criminal justice reform bill called "The First Step Act," which sought to reduce the number of people in overcrowded federal prisons and improve conditions for those behind bars. When he endorsed the bill, President Trump said, "We're all better off when former inmates can receive and re-enter society as law-abiding, productive citizens." At last month's Republican National Convention, Ivanka Trump called the First Step Act "the most significant criminal justice reform of our generation." In its first year, the First Step Act has literally changed thousands of lives. According to a recent report from the United States Sentencing Commission, the sentences of more than 7,000 federal prisoners, deemed able to safely return to their communities, were reduced. the First Step Act is a modest, but very real, "first step" towards comprehensive criminal justice reform. As part of the legacy of Chuck Colson and the very good work of Prison Fellowship, the bill is an example of the Church's work of restoration.

President Trump has promised that his nomination to replace the late Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg will be announced on Saturday. And, now that Senator Mitt Romney has committed to support the process, it looks probable, perhaps likely, that Mitch McConnell could succeed in seating a new justice before the November election. Democrats will, of course, fight against this with, to quote Nancy Pelosi, “every arrow in their quiver.” Ginsburg was very much a protector of the dark and destructive legacy of Roe v. Wade, at least part of which has become the kind of brutal, divisive, and cruel confirmation hearings we are all now bracing for. As the Heritage Foundation’s Ryan Anderson has said, not only are abortion and Roe great evils against children, but they poison our entire political and judicial systems.

“In a Sane World,” suggests Kathryn Jean Lopez, “America Would Have Just Fallen in Love with the Barrett Family.” After all, Amy Coney Barrett’s scholarly brilliance is recognized by legal minds on both the left and the right. Plus, she’s the mom of seven children, including two that were adopted from Haiti. Her youngest child, who has Down Syndrome, is the favorite of everyone in the family, she revealed in a truth said in jest when she accepted her nomination. Critiques of Barrett have, so far, run the gamut. Some are understandable, such as the complaints about how this process is proceeding in an election year or the questions rooted in fundamental disagreements about judicial philosophy. Other critiques have been uncharitable, even evil. For example, a tweet issued over the weekend suggested that adopting children from Haiti could mean that the Barrett family are white-supremacist colonizers. The stupidest critique award goes to the person who suggested that a religious group Barrett was connected to was the inspiration for Margaret Atwood’s The Handmaid’s Tale.” Turns out, it wasn’t. Though, to be clear, this falls under the category of “irrelevant and pointless even if true.” Roe is why Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the fierce protector of legalized abortion in all forms (including later-term, sex-selective, and disability-targeted abortions) was a hero to the left; and, Roe is why Amy Coney Barrett is the left’s latest villain. More specifically, Barrett represents a new kind of feminism; one that doesn’t come at the expense of children; that doesn’t require rejecting the inherent goodness of a women’s procreative nature. Barrett’s career has been built on her judicial genius, while fully embracing who she is as a woman, a wife, and a mom.
