Description: On KMBZ news it was reported that we are springing forward this weekend, and many are still lobbying to put an end to the twice a year time shift. According to a report from the Hill, an effort to permanently stay in Daylight saving time was renewed this week by politicians on both sides of the aisle. The senators behind it argue that getting rid of the time shift practice has positive effects on our health, including reducing the risk of seasonal depression, and offering more stability for families throughout the year. According to National Geographic, the practice started gaining traction after World War I for varying reasons, but mostly energy savings. Clocks jump forward one hour at 2am Sunday morning, meaning when the clock strikes 2, it will actually be 3, and you lose an hour of sleep, but gain an hour of daylight.
