A Williasmport Army Veteran uses creative writing to seek healing from PTSD and other issues, and wants to offer the experience to other veterans and their spouses by starting a 6-week creative writing group at the Williamsport Vet Center.	A creative writing course is Travis Harman's internship in the Masters Degree program at Wilkes University, and will provide veterans who are signed up for the course an outlet to work through feelings they might have about their service.	In Touch WWPA, WMLP				Travis Hartman describes his experiences as a soldier deployed to Afghanistan in the early 2000s, and says how writing and teaching is his way to heal and recover by experiencing success in publishing his writing and hopes to expose his students to the same success.

First responders and military veterans can be overwhelmed by emotions after they cease service, return home or as they continue to run towards danger willingly. They need a place where they can work through trauma and trust issues with like-minded veterans and other volunteers willing to help in an outdoor atmosphere without having to spend their resources.	An over 23-hundred acre camp called Camp Freedom was opened in Northeast PA near Carbondale that serves military veterans, first responders and Gold Star Families for free, that provides outdoor activities, cameraderie and opportunitiy to heal from trauma and other wounds suffered through PTSD.	In Touch WBZD	31-Mar	7am	20 Min	Executive Director of Camp Freedom, Matt Guedes, describes the atmosphere of healing that can be found at Camp Freedom. As an army veteran and minister, he seeks to facilitate healing for those who need it at the camp through activities that build trust and cameraderie. As a partner with Danny Koker of Kounts Customs, Guedes explains that they raise money annually through special motorcycle and car builds that are auctioned off at Camp Freedom events.
