Segment 2-Host Wayne Ozio, welcomes back Daylen Damron, Orange County Game Warden. People who are fisherman need to be aware of the laws on cleaning their boats. If they do not clean out their boats properly they can carry aquatic plants such as Giant Salvina which rapidly expands. Salviana can overgrow and replace native plants which create dense surface cover preventing light and atmospheric oxygen from entering the water. Meanwhile, decomposing material drops to the bottom, greatly consuming dissolved oxygen needed by fish and other aquatic life.

CBN News Washington Senior Correspondent Paul Strand Reports: When it comes to how Americans feel about abortion, the numbers aren't even close, especially on extreme positions. Only about 10 percent feel so strongly about life that they'd ban the procedure altogether. On the other end of the spectrum, only 10 percent refuse any restrictions on the practice. Meanwhile, polls show 80 percent are open to pursuing compromises that could reduce abortions. So does that willingness make them pro-life or pro-choice? But Camosy, author of Beyond the Abortion

Wars, said the extremes have managed to rip the country in two. Christina Forrester, executive director of "Christian Democrats of America," regularly sees the hatred. In such an atmosphere, one strategy would be to appeal to the larger number instead of those on the 10 percent fringes. In order to move forward, Camosy reminds lawmakers they will likely have to support things they don't find totally acceptable. Only a little more than 1 percent of abortions deal with pregnancies caused by rape or incest. And a whopping 83 percent of Americans want those abortions kept legal. For many pro-choice Democrats, compromise means seeing some abortions banned. But Camosy says they'll find support, even among a majority of pro-choicers. Surveys confirm that point of view. Sixty-one percent of Americans would allow abortions in the first three months of pregnancy. Then numbers go down, with 27 percent allowing abortion in the second trimester and only 14 percent for the last three months. Forrester, a Democrat, says she would go earlier than the 20-week abortion ban many Republicans are pushing in Congress. Another part of this debate affecting families reaches into the workplace in terms of equality. Republicans would have to accept new rules or government incentives for employers, an expensive proposition. It means heavily-subsidized childcare when needed and guaranteed maternal leave. Both Forrester and Camosy said taking these measures would make having children more affordable and less stressful for women, which would help reduce abortions. This could also help if and when future abortion restrictions make it to the Supreme Court. In the past, justices have ruled such bans unconstitutional because they place "undue burdens" on women. If Republicans were to pay what it takes for most women to forsake abortions and Democrats would be willing to give on some restrictions, progress could finally take place and save lives

CBN News Reporter Chuck Holton Reports: Some in law enforcement call it "The Ferguson Effect." It's the growing animosity between police and the communities they serve. With law enforcement officers under intense scrutiny both on and off duty and a spike in violence against men and women in blue, many cops across the nation are thinking twice about the way they do their jobs. Joe Collins is one of them. He's a husband and father of two boys who lives in Blacksburg, Virginia. He's a veteran of both the Marines and the U.S. Army. He's seen plenty of combat. When Collins returned from Iraq, he was looking for the same type of brotherhood he had in the military. And law enforcement seemed like a good fit. But after 14 years with the Montgomery County Sheriff's Department, Collins said police work is not what it used to be. Police work has always been a tough job, and sometimes cops go too far. But violence against the police is rising. So far in 2016, officer deaths by shooting are up 300 percent from the previous year, with a marked increase in ambush-style attacks. In February, police woman Ashley Guindon was murdered responding to a domestic disturbance in Virginia. It was her first day on the job. She was the tenth officer to die in the line of duty that month. Cell phones and surveillance cameras are everywhere, and that takes a toll on law enforcement as well. Many cops today fear their next call could end up as a viral video, possibly ending their career or even their life. Michael Wood agreed. He's an author and contributor to the website PoliceOne.com. The result is that tension on the streets is high. With violence rising, tactics and equipment that were developed by the military are now being used to make policing safer in the face of rising violence. Police deaths in the line of duty have declined by about a third since the 1970s when they hit their peak. But that doesn't necessarily tell the whole story. Battlefield technologies developed in Iraq and Afghanistan have trickled down to police departments across the country and that means an officer involved in a shooting has a much better chance of survival than he did 40 years ago. At the same time they are being subjected to increasing restrictions, cops are being asked to do more with less Segment 1-Host Wayne Ozio welcomes Julie Fregia, Program Director of Family Services of Southeast Texas. Julie talks about healthy choices for adolescents. Family Services plays a big part in the public school system, helping children that have been abused physically, emotionally and also parents that have been in prison or having been in foster care/CPS. They help children that are dealing with peer pressure and self-esteem. These children have lots of issues that most adults have never had to deal with. Each child was created for a purpose. They offer a 10 week program for children that are at risk. This program helps these children how to be a good friend to other by teaching the children to be good listeners. All children need dreams and goals to be a success.

Segment 2-Host, Michelle Parker, welcomes Mike Perez with the Salvation Army Boys and Girls Club in Beaumont, Texas. Mike talk about the critical mass. Critical mass is how many people you have to reach before you judge that you're having an impact on that social change. There is great importance of powering and changing a life. But if we are going to solve social issues we have to reach a critical mass. So critical mass focuses on if I'm going to help 2 kids but there's 5 kids in a classroom, then I need to help those 3 kids also. Critical Mass is all about the bigger picture.

CBN News Reporter Mark Martin Reports: Author and activist Erin Merryn is on a mission to protect children from being sexually abused. With millions of victims in the United States alone, the Illinois woman is taking her fight to all 50 states and beyond. People magazine named her one of 15 women changing the world. With a bubbly baby girl, supportive husband, and infectious personality, you'd never guess Erin Merryn has endured tragic, unimaginable acts. This vibrant 30-year-old is a survivor of sexual abuse. Merryn said it started when she was just 6 years old at her first sleep-over. She said the uncle of her best friend sexually abused her during the night. The first time. Merryn never told anyone, and she says until she turned 8 and a half, when her family moved from the area, the man repeatedly sexually abused her. He even brutally raped her just weeks shy of her seventh birthday. She said he continued to threaten her to keep quiet, and she complied. Even after she and her family moved to a new neighborhood, sexual abuse continued. Merryn said this time the perpetrator was an older cousin, someone she had viewed as a brother figure. Merryn wrote about her despair in her childhood diary. Merryn finally broke her silence when her younger sister told her that she, too, was being sexually abused by the same cousin. The two told their parents who believed them 100 percent. The next step was telling their story to a forensic investigator at The Children's Advocacy Center of North and Northwest

Cook County. More than 900 of these non-profit centers exist around the country. The room where Merryn found her voice has a two-way mirror. As she shared her story with a trained therapist, behind that mirror investigators listened, collecting information to build a case against a perpetrator. Merryn said her cousin confessed to the crime, was sentenced to seven years probation, and put in a sex offender treatment program instead of receiving jail time. However, her early childhood abuser was never prosecuted. What Merryn and her sister went through is by no means isolated. Merryn eventually went on to become a social worker at a counseling agency. But God had different plans for her to help children and teens on a national and international level. He used her childhood diary to spark a new idea. At that, Erin's Law was born. The law requires age-appropriate personal body safety and sexual abuse prevention curriculum for pre-kindergarten through 12th grade students in public schools. It educates kids on safe touch, unsafe touch; safe secrets, unsafe secrets; how to get away and tell. Merryn is on a mission to find either a state senator or representative in each state to sponsor the bill, draft it, and introduce it to lawmakers for an eventual vote. Erin's Law is spreading like wildfire, even drawing the attention of celebrities like Oprah and Katie Couric, and magazines like People and Glamour. In a little more than four years it's passed in 21 states and pending in 22, with seven to go. It's a legacy she'll leave for her baby girl and millions of other children who, because of a law, will be protected from the grip of sexual abuse.
