CBN News Reporter Caitlin Burke Reports: Alcoholism remains a leading cause of death in the United States. But even with all the research poured into the problem, it's a condition that's often misunderstood. When someone consistently drinks large amounts of alcohol it injures the brain, specifically the limbic system, or the brain's control center. When alcohol is consumed, it enters the blood stream and goes to this control center where it releases dopamine. While that chemical can make you feel good, it can also injure the brain as more of it is released overtime. The alcohol essentially causes the brain's control center to short circuit, overwhelming how you think, feel, and manage your emotions. Another misunderstood fact about alcoholism: females can become addicted more easily than their male counterparts. When a female drinks, her body absorbs 50 percent more alcohol per drink than a male. Because of this, Urschel says female alcoholics face more medical problems. This becomes even more of a concern as alcohol beverage companies spend millions appealing to women through television ads and social media. Hanna Fobare, 24, believed all the hype and turned to drugs and alcohol when the pressure to perform in college athletics got to be too much. As Fobare embraced her new lifestyle--the friends, parties and boys--the addiction quickly took over. When she started failing classes, Fobare realized she couldn't lie to her family any longer. Her parents stepped in and sent her to Enterhealth. There she received a dual diagnosis--as is common with many alcoholics. Fobare is now one year sober, but it hasn't been easy. Her first attempt led to a relapse, detox and time in a state-funded rehab facility. Both she and Urschel stress that the hardest thing for a recovering addict to understand is the need for constant maintenance. While the alcohol damage never goes away, Urschel says the brain contains an amazing ability to reboot and heal. With the right treatment, there's a 85 to 90 percent chance the brain will go back to its normal state.

CBN News Reporter Heather Sells Reports: Pete Leonard first developed a love for fresh-roasted coffee during a missions trip to Brazil. The former Arthur Andersen business consultant returned home and made his own roaster in his Weber grill. Around the same time, he noticed that a relative who had recently been released from prison was unable to find work. Initially, Leonard thought it was an isolated incident, but he soon learned differently. He discovered that U.S. prisons release more than 600,000 people every year and that they face multiple obstacles in reentering society. Chief among these obstacles is employment. Dr. Karen Swanson, director of The Institute for Prison Ministries at Wheaton College, says that most employers simply don't want to hire anyone with a criminal background. Leonard's solution: Take advantage of America's obsession with coffee by creating a premium coffee-roasting company—and employ former felons to run it. It's a match made in coffee heaven. More than 70 million Americans have a criminal background and at the same time, Americans overall are drinking 400 million cups of coffee a day, driving specialty sales up 20 percent. One of Leonard's early hires, Louis Dooley, was released from prison after serving 15 years for armed robbery and attempted murder. Dooley told CBN News that getting out proved to be a huge challenge. Dooley became a believer and worked hard to turn his life around while behind bars. Still, no employer would take a chance. Another ex-felon, Amy, ran into similar dead-ends. In addition to a banking resume, her background included a white collar crime conviction. Neither she nor Dooley could get past a small box that's on most job applications and must be checked if an applicant has a criminal record. But at 'I Have a Bean.' Leonard's company, both Amy and Dooley found the door open. Leonard said that ultimately, he's not concerned with job seekers' pasts. Since starting the company nine years ago, Leonard has hired 35 people out of prison and says that today, all but two are the success stories he believed could happen. The positive result is no accident. Leonard carefully vets each potential employee before hiring. He finds out if they've worked to rebuild their lives while behind bars—and whether they've stuck to that path after getting out. He's also a stickler for quality. Leonard is more than a boss — he's a witness, watching his employees transform from down and discouraged to confident and marketable. Today, Dooley works as the regional director for Set Free Ministries in Illinois. The non-profit provides Bible study courses to inmates in prisons and jails in Missouri and Illinois. Amy manages the front office for I Have a Bean. Their stories speak clearly to the power of transformation and the hope that former prisoners can find once they're able to find a place in the job market. Dr. Swanson believes the concept could become a game-changer for millions who need a second chance. Such experiences can lead—not just to increased marketability—but to a shot at restoration and a new, productive life.

CBN News Reporter Mark Martin Reports: From hacked emails to major data breaches, cyber attacks could potentially cripple our economy and threaten national security. Hackers shut down half of America's Internet on Oct. 21 by targeting Dyn, a company that manages key parts of the Web's infrastructure. Within minutes, the cyber attack took major websites like Twitter and Spotify offline. It was just the latest example of cyber warfare. Other major cyber hacks garnering national attention recently include the Yahoo data breach in September, WikiLeaks emails relating to Hillary Clinton's campaign and the Clinton Foundation, and the leak of roughly 20,000 emails involving the Democratic National Committee in July. Hayman believes today's worst offenders in this computer espionage are China, Russia, and North Korea. FBI special agent Robert Cochran tries to spread the word about cybersecurity danger to companies like Eastern Data in Virginia Beach, Virginia. Cochran said that of the 14,000 agents in the FBI, 1,500 fight cybercrime -- a 60 percent increase in just the last five years. He says for now, the United States is focusing on defense in this new form of warfare. While cyber warfare between nation-states may sound far removed, it's clearly happening each day on a smaller scale. How do you protect yourself at home and on the job? One practice can work for all kinds of viruses — good hygiene. In addition to computer hygiene, Kaiser urges people to lock down the log-in. In other words, add an extra layer of protection beyond your password. There are a number of options such as fingerprint scans currently available on many smartphones and tablets. Kaiser also wants people to be cyberaware. Experts also advise not to forget to back up critical information. Hayman believes education is the best defense. The National Consumers League also helps educate consumers on cybersecurity. So what kinds of laws are on the books to fight cyber crime? Breyault says on the federal level, the protection is surprisingly minimal, and his organization is lobbying to change that.
