If passed, it would make daylight savings time, the spring forward portion of the year, the permanent year-round time, but there is a catch. Under current federal law, states are allowed to opt out of daylight savings time and return strictly to standard time, making the "fall back" portion of the year the permanent year-round time. This means if Missouri passes the bill, it would act as a trigger law that would only go into effect if Congress allows it. 19 other states have passed similar trigger laws. Similar versions of the bill have made progress in past sessions, however members that attended the hearing Wednesday are doubtful any progress will be made this session.

AT&T blamed the outage on an error in coding, without elaborating, and says it was not the result of a cyberattack.

Description: During the Morning News, it was announced that a Missouri lawmaker is, once again, attempting to make cursive writing a requirement in schools. A Representative has filed a bill each of the last 6 years that would require cursive writing to be taught in Missouri schools. The bill has never made it out of the house, and has only been given initial approval twice. The bill was pre-filed in December for the 7th and final time, as she will be leaving the Missouri House due to term limits. The one-page proposal would require cursive be taught in all Missouri public schools and charter schools by 5th grade, and ensure students can pass a cursive competency test. The bill would have no fiscal impact on the education department. Currently, Missouri does not require cursive to be taught in schools.

The new filing says there are more than 500,000 people affected by a data breach last year. It claims the data breach occurred in the Spring but patients were not notified in a timely manner. The lawsuit argues the hospital violated its own privacy policy by waiting five months to inform patients, even though it promises patients a shorter time frame. The lawsuit was originally filed in Clay County Circuit Court but moved to federal court. It points to other lawsuits across the nation involving Perry Johnson and Associates. That's the 3rd party vendor for health information used by NKCH and Meritas.

THE BIG PICTURE:

- Audacy's KC stations were covering and celebrating with thousands of Chiefs fans at the Super Bowl parade when shots rang out wounding 22 and killing one, local Tejano DJ Lisa Lopez-Galvan.

STRONGER TOGETHER:

- Audacy stations in Buffalo, Dallas, and St. Louis picked up live coverage from 98.1 KMBZ.
- Local content from the KC teams combined with the timely action and response of the central team created unparalleled news coverage in real-time.
- 23 KC radio stations joined in promoting the GoFundMe for Lopez-Galvan, which received donations from members of the Chiefs organization and Taylor Swift.

Kansas City Pivots from Celebration to Critical Coverage

After the parade shooting, the market joined with other radio groups to promote funds for local DJ killed.

On February 14, Audacity's 99.7 The Point and 106.5 The Wolf were watching the Kansas City Chiefs celebrate their Super Bowl victory. Their perch, high above Union Station, at the Westin Hotel gave them a great view of the parade and the reviewing stand. 610 Sports Radio was broadcasting on the ground from the parade route, and Audacity team members Kramer Sansone and Cam Smith were taking pictures of the event on the ground.

It was a big day for Kansas City - and our stations were broadcasting live, reporting, and generally celebrating with the million or so people who flooded into town for the event.

"Those of us back at the station were monitoring the parade coverage but generally going about our normal day. We were all so excited for the win and talking about how we ride the wave of success in the coming weeks," said Roxanne Marati, SVP and Market Manager for Kansas City.

"But then, it all flipped. We had afternoon shows in the middle of show prep and others planning interviews - but as soon as we started to get reports, within 15 minutes or so, our stations started delivering constant news and updates."

By 2:15 PM, suspects had been detained, but 22 people had been injured, and one person, a local DJ Lisa Lopez-Galvan from Mid-Coast Radio Project Inc's KKFI, had been killed.

"Lisa's cousin called into one of our shows from Florida. He said she had been shot. He was listening online, and about an hour later, he called in again to update that Lisa's injuries were fatal. To have him call us from Florida speaks to how important our updates were."

Audacity's teams worked together to keep listeners following the shooting. Within hours, Audacity stations in Buffalo, Dallas, and St. Louis picked up live coverage from 98.1 KMBZ's Dana and Parks. Coverage from 610 Sports Radio and 98.1 KMBZ was elevated nationally across Audacity platforms, with curated content and push notifications directing listeners to where they could find the latest updates as the events unfolded.

Kansas City Pivots from Celebration to Critical Coverage

The content from the local market combined with the timely action and response of the central team created unparalleled news coverage in real-time.

"Our on-air talent just jumped into action. No one needed to tell them what to do. They just immediately started working together to get the best information and relay it to the community."

"Internally, we had a lot of our team at the event. All the schools had been closed, and we knew there were a lot of Audacy families at the parade. We made sure everyone was accounted for and safe, but then we got the news about Lisa."

Lisa Lopez-Galvan has a Tejano show on KKFI, and the KC radio community is a tight knit group, Roxanne said, "We knew it was the right thing to do to help her family during this time. Most of the Kansas City radio groups agreed, and we decided that, in one voice, we would support one of our own."

Cumulus, Steel City, Carter Broadcast, and others have started a one-week media campaign to promote the GoFundMe account to help Lopez-Galvan's family.

"We're using the tagline 'Stronger Together' because we are. We compete for dollars and ratings, but we can put all that aside to help someone in the industry who is leaving behind a son and family."

Taylor Swift and several Kansas City Chiefs organization members have donated to the fund.

It's going to take time for our team to process what happened, but we're really grateful our KC Audacy family was safe. I received calls from every level of Audacy offering support and resources. It made me thankful to work with this team and organization."
