Obama.

When you have sat in as many board rooms as Romney, you are comfortable in the art of the deal. After the pre-flight jitters, for Romney, this will be "business as usual."

Romney is comfortable presenting big deals. He knows the material, unlike Obama who must constantly study. Obama doesn't know it cold.

Yet on Nov. 6, millions of voters -- including many in hotly contested swing states -- will cast ballots on e-voting machines that researchers have found are vulnerable to hackers. What is more troubling, say some critics, is that election officials have no way to verify that votes are counted accurately because some states do not use e-voting machines that produce paper ballots.

Blacks and depression. Former U.S. Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. is battling bi-polar disorder, last week the Chicago Fire Department was called to the Chicago River to rescue a man who made a failed suicide attempt and this weekend a professional football player committed murder-suicide. Why are we afraid to admit we have a problem? Why can't we talk about it? Why is it a taboo issue? Would you rather seek spiritual counseling or professional Perri took the final calls about Blacks and depression and started discussion about Should student loan lenders - public and private - forgive the student's debt if the student dies? Should parents be left to pay the bill? One woman had to come out of retirement to pay her late son's private student loan bill that she co-signed for. According to the woman, she receives harassing phone calls from the lender regularly about the debt that she's only been able to pay the interest on. His federal student loan was forgiven once she sent in his death certificate, yet, the private loan lender refuses to do the same. The mother currently has a 11:07-11:19 petition on Change.org to try to change the lenders' mind.
