Lauren Young, Wealth Management Editor/ Reuters, NYC

It's been a bit confusing, but finally it appears an agreement has been hammered out to avoid the "fiscal cliff," subject to approval by the House as early as later today. Nonetheless, it is 147 pages long, and it is called the American Taxpayer Relief Act of 2012. So the final question is, as an individual, what kind of relief? Will it all be relatively seamless for the typical taxpayer, or will there be some changes? What will be noticed first, and what should be of most concern moving forward? Basically, if there is some bite to it, where will the pain be felt? Lauren Young of Reuters will explain what the bill saves, but also point out what typical taxpayers should concern themselves with as far as what will be different, and what has been simply put off for a couple months.

Ralph Perrey/Executive Director of TN Housing Development Agency

In 2006, THDA, with the leadership of the Board of Directors, determined what needed to occur in order for this organization to be an effective change agent. With the Board of Directors' emphasis on preserving and increasing the supply of affordable housing stock, educating providers and consumers of affordable housing, providing flexible products and cultivating a positive image of THDA and affordable housing, THDA senior management identified four major roles this new plan would address. These roles are:

Program Administrator
Industry Leader
Partnership Facilitator
Housing Resource

Together these serve as the recommended means for THDA to not only continue as an effective change agent for the next three years, but also represents what staff believes needs to be in place for THDA to be the best Housing Finance Agency (HFA) in the country.

Officer Cassandra Smith and Erica Brun/Teen Dating Violence Prevention Month

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) reports that one in 11 adolescents say they have been the victim of physical dating violence; a separate survey indicated that one in four teens self-report physical, verbal, emotional or sexual abuse every year. African American and Hispanic students report higher rates of dating violence than white students. Healthy or unhealthy relationship habits develop early. Approximately 72 percent of 8th and 9th graders report "dating." By the time these students get to high school, more than half of them say they see dating violence among their peers. Destructive relationships during the teen years can lead to life-long unhealthy relationship practices, may disrupt normal development, and can contribute to other unhealthy behaviors in teens that, if left unchecked, can lead to problems over a lifetime. The CDC's 2007 Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System survey indicates that adolescents who report being physically hurt in a dating relationship were also more likely to report that they engage in risky sexual behavior, binge drink, use drugs, attempt suicide, and participate in physical fights. Prevention initiatives include early education about healthy dating practices. Choose Respect, a CDC initiative aimed at adolescents, raises awareness about teen dating violence and promotes healthy relationship practices by challenging harmful beliefs about dating violence. Policymakers can play a role in preventing teen dating violence. At least 19 states have laws that urge or require school boards to develop curriculum on teen dating violence. Many states have also adopted teen dating violence awareness weeks or months, in an effort to draw the public's attention to a national campaign that promotes prevention, safe dating practices and offers information and resources.
