Raza Rumi, a Pakistani author, journalist and blogger and follower of Sufi thought talks about the tradition of hospitality, friendship and loyalty and the divergent ways these traditions shape and reflect Eastern and Western cultures. The subject of hospitality holds a certain irony for Raza who was forced to flee from his country after narrowly missing an assassination attempt on his life in Lahore which tragically killed his driver.

Issues: Sufi thought and traditions, Sufi hospitality, influence of Sufism on East and West

This month's Tidings program, originally broadcast on WPKN in 2010, asks "What is dying like?" a question both "intrusive and presumptive that can't be answered and maybe that's the answer", according to Hazel Kahan who interviewed three health professionals, experienced in working with the dying. Hazel's quest for answers to her question yielded the conversations contained in this program, rich observations that pull back the curtain on what is knowable about the experience of dying but also leaves us humbled by what it appears can never be known.
