Health - COVID	FOX49 News on 40.2	4/14	7:16	1:57	Improving the quality of our indoor air through having adequate ventilation in the space will reduce our risk. Over two years since the COVID-19 pandemic began - experts still searching for ways to thwart the virus. Dr. Krystal Pollitt focuses on environmental health sciences at Yale University. She says better ventilation will cut some risk in places like schools, but she cautions ventilation overhauls are not going to make indoor spaces completely safe. The Biden White House recently released a so-called "Clean Air in Buildings Challenge" - laying out a roadmap for building owners to inspect and maintain their HVAC systems, circulating outdoor air indoors, and enhancing air filtration. Some in the biodefense community, like Eric Schlote's company Synexis are getting involved in the fight for reduced transmission. Schlote's company is deploying its "Dry Hydrogen Peroxide" technology in indoor spaces that he says fights viruses and bacteria. Schlote says the technology takes naturally occurring oxygen and humidity from the air and is reused to zap bacteria. He says they are already seeing success in children's hospitals. Schlote argues indoor air quality is a national security issue, and he hopes to be involved in the White House's action plan to make business and schools low-risk.
