Free Summer Meal Resources Available to Wash. Parents

Seattle, WA ☞ Summer break is around the corner, and that means many kids will lose a regular source of meals during the week. Programs across the state are offering free meals to fill the gap, as well as educational opportunities to avoid the summer slide. Comments from Marci Asher, executive director, Urban Family Center.

Intro: Summer break is approaching in Washington state, which also means many families can't rely on school for a meal during the day. Schools and summer programs will be stepping up to fill the gap with free summer meals. Marci Asher is head of the Urban Family Center in south King County, which provides mentoring and after school and summer programming. That includes a partnership at Creston Point Apartments in South Seattle, home to about 15-hundred youths, all of whom qualify for free and reduced-price lunch and the majority of whom are people of color. Asher says tackling hunger is the crucial first step for tackling other issues youths face.

Cut 70238 :08 "I realize now that there's so many behaviors that are associated with kids being hungry, which is a huge thing at our complex and with what our kids deal with."

Tag: Asher says their partners at United Way of King County are offering science, technology, engineering and math ☞ or STEM ☞ programming for kids over the summer to combat the learning slide children experience without school. Washington parents can find free summer meals and other programs near them by searching for "Parent Help 1-2-3."

Second Cut: The lack of meals at school presents a challenge for working families during the summer. Families that qualify for free and reduced-price lunches end up paying an average of 3-hundred dollars more a month on food during the school break. Asher says parents appreciate the type of meal program that places such as Urban Family Center provide.

Cut 71238 :11 "By either giving food away or doing the summer lunch program, you are definitely helping parents that are already living paycheck to paycheck. And just one catastrophic thing can make people homeless, so this is helping to prevent that."

Tag: The summer meal program at Urban Family Center begins on July 9th and is available to everyone.
