| 10/1/21 | This week we're starting a little series on the upcoming local elections. Stay tuned for our next episode with the City Council candidates but today we're kicking things off with incumbent state delegate Sally Hudson. And in the second half of the show we're excited to introduce you to Dr. Dena Jennings. She's a physician, a musician, a banjo luthier, a healer, a music festival organizer and she's even farming and restoring a large farm here in central Virginia. |
| 10/19/21 | In this episode we're continuing our series on the local elections with interviews with two city council candidates. Juandiego Wade and Brian Pinkston won the Democratic primary for the two open at-large city council seats back in June. |
| 10/22/21 | There are a lot of important elections in Virginia this year. You can listen to our interviews with State Delegate Sally Hudson and the Democratic City Council candidates in this feed. But today we're talking to Independent City Council candidate Yas Washington. And in the second half of the episode we're back to our usual arts and culture coverage with the editors of the latest issue of Mala Leche, a local feminist zine. |
| 10/29/21 | In this episode, we learn more about the new Comprehensive Plan for the city of Charlottesville. This process of laying out a vision for the city started nearly five years ago. On Tuesday October 19th, the planning commission made a major step by recommending the plan to City Council for approval. We get the inside scoop with Charlottesville Planning Commissioner, Lyle Solla-Yates. |
| 11/12/21 | This week, we heard from Dr. Avula of the Virginia Department of Health about the COVID-19 vaccine for children ages 5-11 and booster shots for the rest of us. |
| 12/1/21 | This week, we talk about the power of state legislatures, how citizens can engage with them, and how states can shape national priorities. |
| 12/16/21 | This week, we look at how cities across Virginia - and America - have zoned their way out of 'missing middle' housing over the last 80 years. And what some cities in Virginia are doing to address the problem today. |
