Duration: 2:00

Rick Maranon

After the news that the Trump administration wants to ban flavored vape products, local vape stores want to set the record straight about deaths and illnesses being tied to vaping. Rolling Vapors owner James McEntire says flavored vaping product sales have dropped dramatically in just weeks because of the speculation about vaping and related deaths. James says it's easy to buy tainted and even fatally flawed vaping products off the black market and from non-reputable sellers online and says stores like his are being unfairly lumped into the problem. James says his products are government tested and people need to buy from established folks who have been selling for years and are therefore educated on the industry. Hotbox Tulsa owner Resham Korihe says he's seen some vape smokers try to go back to cigarettes as a result of all the bad press. Both owners say the new rules and bans will hurt their bottom lines, and not the actual folks selling illegal and tainted products. Some stores in the Tulsa area have already voluntarily removed their flavored products just because they aren't sure what's going on. The ones who still have it on their shelves are confident in the quality of what they sell.

Justin Ayer

The Coweta Police department held an active shooter training today. Coweta police chief Mike Bell said the unit actually failed the training, but it's what he expected. He hopes to learn from their mistakes, so if this were to happen in real life, they would know what to do. Bell says it's important that police and fire get inside the building as quickly as possible. The two-hour training consisted of two people playing active shooters. Volunteers played people hurt, some dead, and rescue teams took them out of the building. The training is a coincidence, happening at the same day and time as the El Paso Walmart shootings. Airport Makes Repairs to Runways

Date: 08/22/19 9pm

Duration: 2:00

Rick Maranon

The Tulsa International Airport is laying some of the thickest concrete in Oklahoma, at a whopping 17 inches thick in an effort to make repairs to the taxiway Juliet. Juliet is one of the main ways planes get to the main runway at TIA, and Airport Operations Manager Donald Wyatt says it got to be in such bad shape because of wear and tear and there were fears that planes travelling over it could suck in stones that broke off from the pavement. Simply patching and filling potholes was no longer a viable option. Senior Project Engineer Brian Aussiker says the pavement is so thick for multiple reasons. Although TIA doesn't have regular Boeing 747 service, it must be ready to accommodate one of the biggest planes in the world at any time. The airport says the project should be finished in time for the holiday travel season.

Lead artist of the project, Rick Lowe, says the goal is to invite local artists to help tell Greenwood's story through multiple temporary art installations. Local artists like Phetote Mshairi say that for them, the project isn't just personal, and it's about reminding others that when you come together, good can come from tragedy. The city says they're expecting a variety of art, everything from music to poetry, to sculptures and designs.
