Saturday: On today's WIHS Journal with Paul Kretschmer, hear about a project supported by Connecticut's junior US senator Chris Murphy that seeks to clean up the environmental waste at former industrial sites so the land can be re-used. Such plots of land are known as brownfields, the term of which references the waste, mostly toxic substances that are present after the owner of such a factory or similar building has gone out of business. When that happens, the creator of the toxic waste is no longer financially capable of restoring the land to a safe use. Senator Murphy is supportive of funding that enables government or private developers to remove, clean up that toxic waste so the land is again useable for future development.
