Program: Lines That Divide: The Great Stem Cell Debate

With the Obama administration recently announcing its policy change on the issue of stem cell research and regenerative medicine, the questions surrounding this issue are increasingly more complex. This is why Lines That Divide: The Great Stem Cell Debate, a feature length documentary on stem cell research was made. Is stem cell research a potential miracle cure for diseases or a form of biological colonialism? The debate still rages over this controversial science. Supporters argue that it is our moral duty to pursue scientific progress that provides healing hope for humanity. Detractors argue that the ends don't justify the means in harvesting some human life to save others places our nations heart and soul on the same path as Germany in the late 1930's. This documentary seeks to educate the public on the scientific basics of stem cell research and the moral issues surrounding it. By exposing the hype and sensationalism on both side and asking the right questions to leading authorities Lines That Divide will become the definitive teaching tool as we continue into the 21st century.
