The Defense Department said it made the exception at the request of event organizers, and also because of all the national attention surrounding the event. The decision came just weeks after the Pentagon decided to recognize June as gay pride month. Dozens of military personnel participated in the parade, marching alongside a vintage Army truck draped with a "Freedom to Serve" banner and a rainbow flag, as well as flower-decorated floats, according to The Associated Press. Troops dressed in civilian clothes also marched in the parade. Meanwhile, the U.S. House of Representatives on Thursday passed on a 247-166 vote an amendment to a 2013 defense spending bill prohibiting same-sex weddings or other union ceremonies from taking place on military bases.
