

Cold Snap – 1

DM/MEH

1/28/19

Mon PM/Tue AM

Another blast of cold air is entering Arkansas today (Monday). Meteorologist Chuck Rickard with the National Weather Service says temperatures will drop below freezing, but snow and ice aren't expected for most of the state.

NEWS05 0:19 “...to be the cold”

The cold front, which has already entered the northern part Arkansas, could bring small amounts of rain and snow overnight. Forecasters say the southeastern part of the state could see significant accumulation. The cold snap is predicted to last through the week, but temperatures are forecasted to rise into the 50s again by the weekend.

Cold Snap – 2

DM/MEH

1/28/19

Mon PM/Tue AM

Forecasters are predicting a sharp drop in temperatures starting tonight (Monday). Chuck Rickard, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service, says the wind chill factor could mean temperatures in the single digits for much of the state in the middle of the week.

NEWS06 0:11 “...on Wednesday afternoon”

Light snow flurries are possible for northern and central Arkansas, but the southeastern area of the state could see up to an inch of snow. Temperatures are predicted to rise again by the weekend, with highs in the 60s by Sunday.