[TAKE PKGDURATION:2:06] {PKG}<The world's oceans contain an almost endless source of clean energy. And researchers are trying to figure out how to harness that energy. One of the places they're doing it is here in the shadow of the Rocky Mountains... in landlocked Colorado.TRACK / SOTSThe world's oceans cover more than 70 percent of the planet...NATS – ocean waves...and the waves moving through them carry the promise of endlessly renewable... clean energy waiting to be harnessed.NATS – ocean wavesColorado may seem like an odd place to study the ocean.NATS – wave machineBut here at the National Renewable Energy Laboratory near Denver...NATS – CANDON / We're in the sea wave environment laboratory, or SWEL.... a 13-thousand gallon wave tank is helping researchers test new designs that can capture that kinetic energy and transform it into electricity.SOT – CHARLES CANDON / Basically, the waves come by and push the top float up and down. And you can harness that motion as energy.The idea is that ocean waves might one day help generate clean electricity and send it to electrical grids onshore. The federal government estimates waves have enough power to eventually provide almost 60-percent of the country's electricity.SOT - CHARLES CANDON, RESEARCH ENGINEER, NATIONAL RENEWABLE ENERGY LABORATORY / Those waves are always there and they have tons of energy.Making electricity is a major source of human-caused climate change. Companies like CalWave are working to perfect cleaner devices that generate current without burning fossil fuels. Designs from CalWave and several other companies will soon be in the water at a full-scale Department of Energy testing site off the coast of Oregon... expected to be up and running by 2025.SOT – Marcus Lehmann, cofounder / CEO CalWave Power Technologies / 08:05 – We're initially focusing on coastal and remote communities // and then globally, that's a large potential to really help fill that gap to get us to 100% clean energy.Until then... researchers and engineers like Charles Candon will keep looking for the best ocean-faring designs... here on the plains of Colorado.CS SN ARVADA COLORADO.>
