CDC Expert: What Arizonans Need to Know About MERS	05/26/14, 04:18pm 05/27/14, 10:18pm 05/28/14, 09:40am 05/29/14, 10:18am	120 seconds	With recent word on the first U.S. transmission of Middle East Respiratory Syndrome, or MERS, many are concerned about what it could mean for public health. Dr. David Swerdlow is leading the Center for Disease Control and Prevention's response team for this virus. There is no alarm for Arizonans at this point, with Swerdlow explaining that while the virus can spread from person to person, it isn't easily transmitted. "There's been no sustained transmission like you see with flu, where it goes from person to person to person," he explains. "So, at the current time, we are concerned about the virus, we do think that there could be imported cases, but we don't see this being a major problem in the U.S. with widespread cases." According to the CDC, the first U.S. transmission happened when an Illinois resident had contact with a person in Indiana, who was infected while traveling in Saudi Arabia. These two cases of MERS are not linked to third patient in Florida, who had also traveled to Saudi Arabia. MERS was first reported in Saudi Arabia in 2012. There have been almost 600 confirmed cases in 15 countries, and 173 deaths. Swerdlow says most patients develop respiratory illness, with fever, cough and shortness of breath. And he says there is no specific treatment. "Of course, if a person gets a respiratory illness like this, they can be treated in an intensive care unit if needed, and sort of the standard things that we do for patients with respiratory illness," he stresses. "But there's no specific treatment, like an anti-viral." The CDC advises health care workers traveling to the Arabian Peninsula to follow guidelines for infection control, and for other travelers to take precautions to protect their health. As with any respiratory illness, Swerdlow says that means frequent hand washing, covering coughs and sneezes, and avoiding contact with those who are sick.

Arizonans Urged to Be Careful in Summer Heat	See attached invoice	60 seconds	As the heat of summer descends upon the Grand Canyon State, state health officials are urging Arizonans to be careful in the potentially deadly weather. This is the time of year when it's easy to fall victim to heat exhaustion, which can cause serious health problems, said Yomy Diaz, injury-prevention program manager for the Arizona Department of Health Services. She said those at greatest risk of heat-related illness are seniors and children, whose bodies can overheat five times faster than an adult. "So once they reach - their internal body heat - once they reach 104 degrees," she said, "that can cause death because their bodies are so small." Diaz stressed that leaving a child in a hot car even for a short time can be dangerous and have longer-term negative health consequences. According to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, she said, in about half the cases where children died from heat stroke in America in the past 15 years, the caregiver reported "forgetting" the child was even in the vehicle. Sometimes, Diaz added, kids can sneak into an unlocked family vehicle at home - and get locked inside. "Always keep your vehicles locked," she said. "Teach your children to not go into a vehicle when it's parked in the garage." Nationally, Diaz said, 44 children died last year after being locked inside or getting stuck inside a hot car.
