Synopsis:	Pending legislation in Pennsylvania may soon give adoptees access to previously closed off records... Family Life's Abigail Ferenczy has details. The bill would allow adoptees born in Pennsylvania to fully access their birth records at age 19. The legislation has already passed in the house and will have a hearing before the Senate Committee on Aging and Youth next month. If approved, it could get a full Senate vote and head to Governor Corbett's desk by summer. Advocates say it's a matter of civil rights, in which a minority is being denied the same right as the majority. But several conservative groups oppose the bill over issues of privacy. Pro life groups especially say compromising birth parents' privacy could lead to an increase in abortions.
