Description: On April 4th, an assassin's bullet ended Martin Luther King's life. For several months leading up to that Dr. King was being filmed by a crew from Thirteen's Public Broadcasting Laboratory series. The film was hurriedly finished and broadcast the week following the assassination, winning the Emmy as Best

Documentary. "Free at Last – Martin Luther King, Jr." is a cinema-verite style portrait that provides an insightful, behind-the-scenes view of the man and his mission as Dr. King toured southern black communities, planning and organizing the Poor Peoples' Campaign and March on Washington. It was a march that he was not to lead. Informed and resolute in the opening scenes, Dr. King was clearly prescient in particular on matters of economic inequality. The film is both touching and eerie. In one scene Dr. King is feted at an impromptu 39th birthday party, in another we see him discussing violent threats against his life and those of others. In yet another scene Dr. King and the Reverend James Bevel and yourself explain nonviolence a powerful tactic. At the film's end Dr. King decides that he will take time away from the tour to speak at a local rally in support of a sanitation workers strike in Memphis. And makes plans to rejoin with the Thirteen crew and continue the Poor People's Campaign and March tour. A promise he would not be able to keep.
