Potomac Landfill, the source of the recent rotten egg stench in Dumfries, may have violated state air pollution laws. Following an unusually high amount of rain in September, Dumfries residents, drivers on Interstate 95 and others complained to the town and the Department of Environmental Quality about an odor in the area around the landfill. DEQ sent a “Notice of Violation” to Potomac Landfill. In its response, landfill officials contend the alleged violations have either been resolved or they will refute them. (Follow up)

Marine Corps supporters near Camp Lejeune are launching a national effort to build a $12 million museum documenting the service's history in North and South Carolina. The museum will showcase the service's development of amphibious and airborne battle tactics along the shores of North Carolina, as well as the inclusion of females and the training of the first blacks to serve in its ranks. In contrast to other military-centered collections, organizers say they want to pay special attention to the role civilian communities played in supporting the Marine Corps during the crucial years of their development in both states.

Wal-Mart has pulled a batch of powdered infant formula from more than 3,000 of its stores nationwide after a newborn Missouri boy who was fed the formula died from what preliminary tests indicate was a rare bacterial infection. The government has not ordered a recall of the 12.5-ounce cans of Enfamil Newborn powder with the lot number ZP1K7G. The company decided to pull the lot "out of an abundance of caution" while health officials investigate the death of a 10-day-old. The product could go back on shelves depending on the outcome of the investigation, but customers who bought the cans have the option of returning them for a refund or exchange.

Maryland's utility regulator fined Pepco $1 million for failing to provide Maryland with customers with reliable electrical service. In addition to the fine, they are required to file a five year work plan detailing how the company will improve both customer service and reliability of electrical service. The People's Counsel recommended a fine of $14.7 million and no less than $10 million. They estimate it cost residents an estimated $23 million to $115 million dollars during power outages.
